1. What in your background qualifies you to serve on the Fredericksburg City Council?

Tom Marschall: Fredericksburg native going back to 1846, BS degree from Texas A&M university. Served 11 years as US Army logistics officer which included training in management, leadership and budgeting.

James McDonald: I love Fredericksburg. I love being part of this community. And I would welcome the opportunity to be part of finding solutions to the problems and challenges we face, big and small, and to working hard to make Fredericksburg an even better place to live and thrive and raise a family. If forced to sum myself up in one sentence, I would say I am, at heart, a person who likes to solve problems—especially problems that look to be impossible to solve. And that is why I am running for City Council.

Kathy Sanford O'Neill: Having previously served on the City Council, I am very familiar with the work the Council does as well as the work of the City Staff. I am a lawyer and retired Administrative Law Judge. Both of those professions prepared me to take a reasoned approach to issues, listen to affected parties, and make decisions that are in the best interests of the City. Since leaving the Council, I have attended many Council meetings, met with City Staff and other City leaders. I have experience with and understand city planning, something that is key to Council decisions.

Robert Phoenix: I'm consultant and multi-media producer. I have a rather eclectic background and have worked in the service industry, dot.com and journalism. I managed baseball teams for five years in the Austin area, including one, championship team. I've been studying economic theory, mass psychology, geo-politics and history most of my life with an understanding of cycles and trends. I am deeply concerned about what is taking place in our world and feel like serving on a local level is the best place for me to address those concerns.

Polly Rickert: I have over 25 years of management consulting and business management experience, which I apply to my understanding of and decision-making on City government services and actions. I have served the community on the Community Visioning process (Business and Government committees), Planning and Zoning Commission, and currently serve as a City Councilmember.

I have also worked to create a non-profit organization, Haus Verein, which is focused on solutions to bring middle income working family housing to our community.

Bobby Watson: I believe that my 40 plus years of experience as a successful businessman and business owner, as well as my 15 years of continuous involvement in the Fredericksburg community, gives me the background and the qualifications needed to continue to serve on the Fredericksburg City Council. My community involvement includes leadership roles in Leadership Gillespie County, Fredericksburg Chamber of Commerce as well as positions on the Fredericksburg Convention and Visitors Bureau, Fredericksburg Planning & Zoning Board, Gillespie County Economic Development Commission, Gillespie County Airport Advisory Board and 3 terms as a Fredericksburg City Councilman.

2. What is the most pressing issue facing the Fredericksburg City Council and what do you hope/plan to do about it?

Tom Marschall: Following the oaths that they are sworn to uphold. Call out any action by the council that opposes the sworn oath.

James McDonald: The most pressing issue for the current Council appears to be a groupthink mentality. For one reason and another, I've attended a number of City Council meetings over the last few years, and I've come away from those meetings with the sense that there doesn't seem to be much variation of opinion or perspective among the current members of the Council. I think that is unfortunate, and I don't believe it's in the best interests of the city. Competing ideas and different perspectives are the bedrock of good government. If elected, I promise to bring both to the City Council.

Kathy Sanford O'Neill: Fredericksburg is a well-run City. Because so much of our economy is driven by the tourist industry, our population expands with visitors every week, so we must ensure sufficient police are available to address that larger population. Because of traffic congestion it is necessary to plan for efficient vehicle and pedestrian movement through and around the City streets. Our Comprehensive Plan is dated and will be reviewed and updated over the next year. And as the City grows, we must ensure that new development is consistent with and enhances the historic character of Fredericksburg.

Robert Phoenix: COVID-19 can't be brushed away that easily. My greatest concern around that is that we'll have another lockdown--more severe than the last. I've been pushing the city to make a declaration that all businesses are essential so that if and when it does happen, we have already determined the path that we will take to protect and support our local businesses. I'm also very concerned about the possibility of a vaccine passport to travel, work and purchase goods. Again, a declaration that Fredericksburg is an open and free city, is essential to maintaining both social and economic equilibrium.

Polly Rickert: We are in an enviable position, with a great quality of life, ample amenities, and an attractive, diverse economy. We have a unique combination of history, outdoor features, agriculture and culinary recognition. My focus is to ensure that future growth creates positive return on investment for the taxpayers and retains the unique small town culture and assets we now enjoy. My plan is to implement long term planning and budgeting, and vote on projects and policies that generate a positive long term tangible and intangible return on investment for the local taxpayer.

Bobby Watson: Fredericksburg is a unique small town that has a strong agricultural community, a growing wine industry as well as a robust tourism business. Finding the balance between managing the town's continued growth and maintaining the quality of life for Fredericksburg's residents is our most pressing challenge. This includes maintaining our high level of city services, attainable housing for our local residents and employees, while maintaining our rich German heritage. I believe we need to expand the city's communication efforts and encourage more community involvement to find solutions to our issues.

3. What are the citizens of Fredericksburg telling you about city problems?

Tom Marschall: Voting is a waste of time.

James McDonald: I'm hearing that the current members of the City Council too often operate as if their obligations, first and foremost, are to city government itself, and not to the citizens who elected them. If I am elected, I pledge to you that I will be a representative of the citizens of Fredericksburg to the city government, not simply a representative of the city government.

Kathy Sanford O'Neill: Most people are very happy with Fredericksburg; that's why they move here, raise their children here, retire here, leave and come back. Some people feel the historic residential areas near Main Street are being overrun with short term rental units to the detriment of the quiet neighborhood they expect. Others discuss the rising property prices and the affordability of housing. And some want to know when we will get so much traffic off of Main Street.

Robert Phoenix: Fredericksburg is blessed in that when the city is open, the money flows in from tourists. That said, tourism is like mono-crop farming, which isn't always the best way to go, especially if a blight or a pest wipes out a particular crop. Fredericksburg needs more economic diversity. I am very much in favor of attracting businesses that manufacture products and can sustain production even in down times with tourism. Manufacturing jobs also generally tend to pay more, which in turn can help people afford the rising cost of housing here in the Hill Country.

Polly Rickert: There is tension between citizens who appreciate the vast array of amenities available in such a small town, and their positive economic impact, and citizens concerned about the negative effects of growth, including a lack of childcare options, middle income housing, loss of neighborhood culture from a large number of second homes and short-term rentals, and issues with traffic and mobility through town particularly at times when tourism levels are high. Trust in government is low in the current political climate. There is a need for increased engagement, more discussion and information sharing with mutual respect for differing perspectives.

Bobby Watson: Citizens are concerned about the growth of short-term rentals in R-1 residential areas. Because of the tourism growth, we are losing neighborhoods to STR's. Another issue that stems from STR's is higher traffic and more noise complaints. This is an issue that will need to be addressed if we are going to keep Fredericksburg a wonderful place to live and raise a family. Lack of attainable housing is another concern. Due to the active real estate market, the increase in STR's and the growth of our economy, the result has been higher prices which makes housing unattainable for many.
